The words "be the change that you wish to see in the world," said by Mahatma Gandhi have a distinct and simple meaning. They are used to encourage people, to help them gain confidence in what they're really able to do, the opportunities they have.

In my opinion, it is indeed possible to be the change you want to see, whether it's a positive or a negative one. But I also think that it's important to realize how your actions will affect other people's lives.

As an example, I would like to present Vladimir Lenin and the October revolution. Although poor people received money, fields to work on, food to eat, the once rich ones lost everything. That lead to more protests which could possibly lead to another revolution but from the other part of society.

But the changes don't have to be so drastic. Another example can be helping a grandma cross the road, giving people compliments, helping one's parents, and many other small things that can make a change too: brighten someone's day.

To conclude, there are different things that can bring something to people's lives, whether it's a historical event or something as simple as helping one's mother to do the housework.
